

Brief description of the department:

This department specializes in teaching community health nursing and epidemiology, nursing management, and topics in health care, politics, economics, and medical sociology in the fourth of four academic stages.

The department aims to introduce students to all preventive, therapeutic, and rehabilitative aspects of maintaining the health of individuals, families, and society as a whole. Students also learn about various infectious and communicable diseases in society and all basic health services, as well as primary health care methods and techniques.

In addition, students will gain an understanding of topics related to nursing management, healthcare, politics, economics, and medical sociology, which will enhance community service and sustainable development. It also promotes the health and well-being of communities by providing healthcare, health education, awareness, training on health and disease prevention, and reducing factors that affect public health.

Improving the health and quality of life of individuals and communities by focusing on disease prevention and control, addressing health, psychological, and social conditions that affect public health, and reducing disparities in access to health services. In addition, preparing scientifically qualified nursing staff to compete in the job market in an academic and creative environment that encourages excellence and professional leadership.